

FIGURE 5.5 Shinkichi Tajiri, Berlin Wall, 1989/1990. (Shinkichi Tajiri Estate)

But Tajiri was not finished with the Wall and instead continually attempted to scale it through critical reflection. In 1990, he sent former student and then–art professor Nobuho Nagasawa a "digitized/colorized photo image of the Berlin Wall in a small picture frame, accompanied by a fragment of the real wall." (Nagasawa responded by creating a piece titled Behind the Great Wall, incorporating several of Tajiri's 1981 panoramas of the Wall with images from their class trip to China's Great Wall.) He traded similarly hybrid image-artifact versions of the Wall with family members and friends. He also produced an unnamed work, still hanging on a wall in his family's castle, of a large computer printout of a 1990 portrait of a hole in the Berlin Wall, with a side border with custom-made cubbyholes for Wall chunks. He continued to hold onto his own smaller artworks about the Wall, remaking the sprawling structural barrier into a critical keepsake.