uncertainties and fears wrought in periods of seeming public revelry and progress.

FIGURE 5.7 Dagmar Schultz, “Audre Lorde, Ika Hügel-Marshall, und Dagmar Schultz vor der zerstörten Berliner Mauer.” (Audre Lorde Archive, John-F.-Kennedy-Institut für Nordamerikastudien, Freie Universität Berlin Archives)

Lorde’s cautious and critical dispositions can also be explored in a pair of visual artifacts, in two photographs of Lorde taken by Schultz by the former Wall during the time of reunification in 1990 (fig. 5.7). They offer opposing stances on the newfound moments by the border, though together they can be read as part of Lorde’s active engagement with new border politics. In the first, Lorde and Ika Hügel-Marshall, Schultz’s partner, stand next to a series of foldable tables set up along a fenced barricade, with pieces of the chiseled Wall for sale. They are gathered at the edge of the city’s Tiergarten in former West Berlin, steps away from tabled remnants of the Wall. Standing arm in arm with Lorde, Hügel-Marshall holds out a small bag with a piece of the Wall inside. The two widely smile, as if caught mid-laugh. A man on the