would become known as Ostpolitik" (Taylor, Berlin Wall, 326, 341–343). See also Daum, Kennedy in Berlin, and Fink and Schäfer, Ostpolitik. For more on the original coverage of Peter Fechter in Western media, see "The Wall of Shame," Time, August 31, 1962.

2. For more on Davis's time studying abroad in Paris, see Kaplan, Dreaming in French.

3. For more on German student movement organizing, see Klimke, Other Alliance; Davis, Changing the World; and Slobodian, Foreign Front.

4. Davis, Angela Davis, 139.

5. "Between Critical Theory and Civil Rights: A Sixties' Journey from Boston to Frankfurt to San Diego," October 2, 2009, Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N.Y., http://www.aacvr-germany.org/index.php/movies-8/conference-talks.

6. Dates vary across accounts of Davis's first trip to Berlin. For this accounting of dating the trip to 1966, I checked against Esther Cooper's papers including a visa for travel into the German Democratic Republic dated from April 30 through May 5, 1966. The document includes a stamp from the Schönefeld Airport in East Berlin. See TAM 347, JP.

7. Margaret Burnham, email message to author, July 27, 2011.

8. "Between Critical Theory and Civil Rights: A Sixties' Journey from Boston to Frankfurt to San Diego," October 2, 2009, Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N.Y., http://www.aacvr-germany.org/index.php/movies-8/conference-talks. For more on Davis's visit to East Berlin in 1966, see Steiniger, Free Angela Davis, 7.

9. Davis, Angela Davis, xvi.

10. "Angela Davis and Toni Morrison: Literacy, Libraries, Liberation," New York Public Library Video, October 27, 2010, http://www.nypl.org/events/programs/2010/10/27/angela-davis-toni-morrison.

11. Davis, Angela Davis, 347.

12. Ibid., 140.

13. Ibid., 143.

14. To further carry this out, the GDR practiced "border control"—itself a euphemistic term that reached far into the internal spaces and private lives of its citizens—by means of comprehensive state surveillance and armed violence against citizens. Davis's textual narrative highlights tactics similar to "border control" used in West Germany and the United States, bringing out paradoxes in Western democracy.

15. Davis, Angela Davis, 140.

16. Ladd, Ghosts of Berlin, 30.

17. Pugh, Architecture, Politics, and Identity in Divided Berlin, 3. Sunhil Manghani also writes of "a Berlin Imaginary" where "a complex, accumulative process whereby an internalized political and cultural discourse of East/West relations develops as the result of an external exchange of images and myths … richly fueled by the symbolic and real division of Berlin" (Manghani, Image Critique and the Fall of the Berlin Wall, 116). Brian Ladd refers to the Wall in one sense as "a zipper" that "signified both unity and division" by generating stories of geopolitical identification and alienation. See Ladd, Ghosts of Berlin, 30.

18. For production and postponement, see Val Adams, "N.B.C.-TV Plans Documentary on Berlin Tunnel It Helped Build," New York Times, October 12, 1962, and Richard F. Shepard, "N.B.C. Postpones Tunnel Telecast," New York Times, October 24, 1962.

A March 1964 episode of the hit Twilight Zone series, titled "I Am the Night—Color Me Black," featured an allegory of national mourning around the fallout from hate and violence, mapping the Berlin Wall with Dallas, Texas; a political prison in Budapest; Birmingham; Shanghai; North Vietnam; and Chicago.

19. Another statement about the Wall that echoes Davis's disavowed formulation can be found in the press conference recording from Louis Armstrong's visit to East Berlin to perform at the Friedrichstadtpalast in April 1965. When asked by reporters how he felt about the Wall, he responds,