“Ain’t worried about the Wall, worried about the audience I’m going to play to tomorrow night. I don’t know nothing about no wall” (“Louis Armstrong in East Berlin,” rbb, The Berlin Wall: A Multimedia History, http://www.the-berlin-wall.com/videos/louis-armstrong-in-east-berlin-739/).

20. For example, see Kelman, Behind the Berlin Wall. On p. 35, Kelman writes of seeing a poster in East Berlin that reads, “Free Angela Davis and the Other Political Patriots in Capitalist Countries.”

21. For narratives of repression and resistance, see Funder, Stasiland.

22. Katherine Pence and Paul Betts identify “cold war Western logic, which often characterized state socialism as essentially a culture of surveillance, privation, economic mismanagement, and colorless lifestyles” (Pence and Betts, Socialist Modern, 7). For more on East German life and representations, see also Betts, Within Walls; Crew, Consuming Germany in the Cold War; and Stitziel, Fashioning Socialism.

23. Höhn and Klimke, Breath of Freedom, 125. For more on Bettina Aptheker attending a women’s conference in Berlin in June 1969 at which she met Charlene Mitchell, see Aptheker, Morning Breaks, 58. For more on the Peace Council, see Daum, Gardner, and Mausbach, America, the Vietnam War, and the World; Grossman and Solomon, Crossing the River; McBride, Hopkins, and Blackshire-Belay, Crosscurrents; and Werner, “Convenient Partnerships?”

24. One counterexample can be found in African American comedian Dick Gregory’s memoir Up From Nigger. Gregory had previously made comments comparing Birmingham and Berlin. In his memoir, he recalls a trip in 1964 to both West and East Berlin, where he attends a Peace Council meeting and writes, “I thought of a comedy line I would use back home to enlist support for world peace in the Black community: ‘A lot of my friends say, “Greg, we weren’t aware that you’re interested in bannin’ the bomb,”’ and I tell them, ‘I wasn’t at first, until I checked all the Black neighborhoods and found out we ain’t got no fallout shelters. We got to ban the bomb—or learn how to catch it.’ … From that moment on, I became an advocate of human rights, human dignity, and human survival.” Later, in the same memoir, he recalls another peace meeting in East Berlin, this one in 1969, the World Assembly for Peace. On the way in London, Gregory reports he was given amateur footage from North Vietnam officials (he says “a home movie”) of the My Lai Massacre and then details being tailed by U.S. government officials, who had listened to his phone conversations. See Gregory and McGraw, Up from Nigger, 191–92.

25. Siegfried Mews, “Spies Are Coming in from Cold War: The Berlin Wall in the Espionage Novel,” in Schürer, Keune, and Jenkins, Berlin Wall, 51. Examples of spy dramas located in Cold War Berlin during this era include John le Carré’s novel The Spy Who Came in from the Cold (1963) and film adaptation (1965), Len Deighton’s Funeral in Berlin (1964), Adam Hall’s Quiller Memorandum (1965), and Alfred Hitchcock’s Torn Curtain (1966), which starred Paul Newman and Julie Andrews. Television episodes of Kraft Suspense Theater and Perry Mason’s “Case of the Fugitive Fraulein” (1965) also featured such tales of intrigue in divided Berlin.

26. As much lore around Kennedy’s speech suggests, grammarians have debated the president’s declaration around its possible meanings. A “Berliner” refers to a citizen of the city of Berlin and, in some areas of Germany, a jelly-filled donut. Scholars such as Jürgen Eichhoff, however, have definitively demonstrated that Kennedy’s usage referred to his urban identification with Berlin and not the pastry. See Eichhoff, “‘Ich bin ein Berliner.’”

27. For more on Kennedy’s visit to Berlin, see Daum, Kennedy in Berlin, 147–56. See also Smyser, Kennedy and the Berlin Wall; Harrison, Driving the Soviets up the Wall; and Kempe, Berlin 1961.

28. Iton, In Search of the Black Fantastic, 35.

29. Robeson, Here I Stand, 1.

30. Given that the intended reason for Robeson’s 1963 visit to East Berlin was related to his health care and recovery, connections to the widely held suspicion that he was poisoned by the CIA or by another government’s counterintelligence agency remain pertinent. As biographers Martin Duberman and Paul Robeson Jr. have noted in their respective studies, there remain glaring