escape repressive control and the sexual advances of the party's leadership. When American huckster Bill Mason (played by Bob Crane) finds her, he aims to make a profit, even as he falls in love. He alternates between his contacts in East Germany's black market, the ruling party, and the American CIA to sell her for a reward. As Mason slips a contraband-filled briefcase over for unchecked access, the narration at the beginning of the film remarks on the shift in border relations: "To get into East Berlin it's not always necessary to go over the Wall, through it, or under it. You might just have something the fellow wants. And if he wants it bad enough, you get what you want." Mason eventually falls for Schultz, which complicates his attempted parlay. The film was panned by critics, not necessarily for its Wall depictions but for its crude portrayal of female sexuality as a form of currency to move back and forth across the border. A New York Times reviewer noted, "It seems to view the cold war as a vast conspiracy to get people undressed, as clumsily and joylessly as possible." A year later, NBC's variety show Laugh-In made a joke at the Wall's expense. In a segment titled "News from the Future," comedian Dan Rowan reported, "Berlin, twenty years from now, 1989. There was dancing in the streets today, as East Germany finally tore down the Berlin Wall. The joy was short-lived, however, as the Wall was quickly replaced with a moat full of alligators." The underlying humor of the Wall's dismantling was paired with a notion that the division would nonetheless endure. In another program, the 1969 Emmy-nominated Bob Hope Christmas Special: Around the World with the USO, the celebrated entertainer shared scenes from his USO visit to West Berlin, in which he was presented by the mayor and U.S. Army command with "half a key to half a city." An audience of servicemen and women was shown erupting in laughter. The fact that the Wall could be leveraged for political humor marked a shift in its perception. The imagination for the Wall's demise remained, but most treated the boundary as ostensibly fixed in the geopolitical landscape.

19. Godfrey, Conceptual Art, 4.

20. Epigraph, pamphlet, Publikation der Berliner Festspiele, 2014, 3.

21. Kaprow, Block, and Deutscher Akademischer Austauschdienst, Sweet Wall Testimonials.

22. Mesch, Modern Art at the Berlin Wall, 185.

23. For more on Kaprow's other projects in Germany, see Kaprow, Herzog, Holtmann, and Kraft, Allan Kaprow in Deutschland.

24. Christo, Baal-Teshuva, Volz, Buddensieg, and Christo, Christo, 22.

25. Ibid., 23. See also O'Doherty et al., Christo and Jeanne-Claude.

26. In 1961, Christo and Jeanne-Claude also created a work in response to the Berlin Crisis, a blockade of oil barrels in Paris titled Iron Curtain.

27. Jennifer Mundy, "Lost Art: Christo and Jeanne-Claude," Tate.co.uk, http://www.tate.org.uk.

28. Christo, Baal-Teshuva, Volz, Buddensieg, and Christo, Christo, 11.

29. Several other American projects of note by the Berlin Wall immediately followed this period. Conceptual artist Lawrence Weiner is another figure of note in this history of artistic intervention. He began addressing the division of Germany in his work in 1971 when he adapted his Broken Off project to include a series of postcards that he sent from East Berlin. In 1975, Weiner was awarded a DAAD grant and directed the avant-garde film A Second Quarter. The film was shot on location in West Berlin and aimed to treat the city as a theoretical laboratory to explore themes of liberation, free expression, and aggression through language games. The scenes take place in a number of dramatized domestic vignettes and one iconic vista of the divided city—looking down along the perspective of the Wall from an observation deck at the bombed-out ruins of the abandoned Anhalter Bahnhof train station. In 1976, Gordon Matta-Clark intended to blow up a portion of the Wall for a show alternately titled New York/Berlin or Soho in Berlin. He was dissuaded from such a gesture and instead plastered advertising posters and stenciled the words "Made in America" directly on the Wall. A film assemblage of his interventions and clashes with authorities is titled The Wall. See Weiner and Gregory, Lawrence Weiner, and Jenkins, City Slivers and Fresh Kills.