76. For more on Afro-Germans and diaspora, see Wright, Becoming Black, 3; Campt, Other Germans, 171; and Weheliye, Phonographies, 147. See also Edwards, Practice of Diaspora.

77. All citations of this poem refer to "Diaspora," in Lorde, Our Dead Behind Us, 32.

78. Another reading of the poetic geography of the "Braceras Grande" can be seen in DeShazer, Poetics of Resistance, 24.

79. For more on Soviet policies of Glasnost and Perestroika, see Service, History of Modern Russia, 448–66, and Boym, Future of Nostalgia, 62–71.

80. For more on the Berlin bombing and the U.S. counterattack on Libya, see Nathalie Malinarich, "Flashback: The Berlin Bombing," on BBC News.com, http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/europe/1653848.stm.

81. Taylor, Berlin Wall, 396; Serge Schmemann, "24,000 Demonstrate in Berlin against Reagan's Visit," New York Times, June 12, 1987.

82. Ted Widmer, "Reagan at the Wall," New York Times, June 12, 2012, A25.

83. Numerous other contemporary American cultural productions draw and reflect on Berlin's division. Some of these include texts such as Dr. Seuss's The Butter Battle Book (1984), Herbert Jay Stern's Judgment in Berlin (1984), and William Buckley Jr.'s The Story of Henri Tod (1984); popular music such as Elton John's "Nikita" (1986); television episodes of MacGyver (1986), Alvin and the Chipmunks' "The Wall" (1988), and the Golden Girls (1988); a comic book installment of Spiderman vs. Wolverine, no. 1 (1987); and film versions of Judgment in Berlin (1988). Several works also influenced American audiences by German cultural figures that closely considered the symbol and site of the Berlin Wall, including Peter Schneider's Der Mauerspringer (The Wall Jumper) (1983) and Wim Wenders's Wings of Desire (1987). The latter was released in West Germany in 1987; the film was predominantly in German but featured American actor Peter Falk, who spoke most of his lines in English. See Wim Wenders, Wings of Desire (New York: Criterion Collection, 1987).

84. Alice H. G. Phillips, "Calling for the Right Kind of Power," TLS, April 15–21, 1988.

85. Review, Booklist, October 1, 1986.

86. Barbara Christian, "Naming the Rage and the Courage," San Francisco Chronicle, review, July 20, 1986, 6.

87. Audre Lorde, "The Dream of Europe—Remarks," in Bolacki and Broeck, Audre Lorde's Transnational Legacies, 25–26. More on this speech can be found in box 17, 2.1.061, ALP. Box 31, no. 2.4.358, ALP, also includes drafts of an unpublished poem, "Berlin Second Time Around," dated October 12, 1988.

88. Bolacki and Broeck, Audre Lorde's Transnational Legacies, 26.

89. Audre Lorde, "Apartheid U.S.A.," in Lorde, Burst of Light, 27.

90. Ibid., 37–38.

91. Lorde, Burst of Light, 131.

92. Ibid., 131–34.

Conclusion

1. On May 2, Hungary began disassembling border fencing, opening up a crossing point into Austria. Protests across Poland and the Baltic republics of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania occurred with far less severe backlash from local authorities and the Soviet Union. See Service, History of Modern Russia, 448–66, and Boym, Future of Nostalgia, 62–71.

2. Taylor, Berlin Wall, 400.

3. Taylor writes, "On Monday 2 October, 10,000 citizens of Leipzig appeared on the streets. They chanted slogans about freedom, but above all they declared: 'We will stay here.' This message was, in its way, even more worrying for Honecker than that conveyed by West Germany–bound hoards of refugees. The regime had gotten used to arresting its dissidents and dumping them in the West. Now they were determined to stay in the East, and there were too many to deport them all" (ibid., 409).

4. For more on Leipzig Movement, see Taylor, Berlin Wall, and Dale, Popular Protest.