imposing boundary of the Wall, seen in the background. The soldier is outfitted in full combat gear, and a helmet weighs heavily on his head, suggested by a slight forward tilt. One of his fellow GIs can be seen in an army jeep behind him, traveling with another photographer, yet their attention is elsewhere, outside the frame. At the image's highest magnification, the soldier's nametag remains out of focus, but his uniform identifies him as likely in the 2nd Battle Group, 6th Infantry in West Germany. The soldier's arms jut out to his sides, and his hands rest below at his hips. This image, as an exceptional single shot, demonstrates two central and productive challenges for Freed in this period: how to identify with his subjects, and how to consider the new Berlin Wall as subject matter within a post-Holocaust European landscape.
