attention to the soldier's affiliation and stance: "In defense of Western Civilization, an American soldier's hand rests on his gun."[7] Freed narrates the photographic moment in personal terms: "We, he and I, two Americans. We meet silently and part silently. Between us, impregnable and as deadly as the wall behind him, is another wall. It is there on the trolley tracks, it crawls along the cobble stones, across the frontiers and oceans, reaching back home, back into our lives and deep into our hearts: dividing us, wherever we meet. I am White and he is Black."[8] Freed's annotation affirms the profound duality of this visual encounter: citizens of the same country stand mere feet away from each other as countrymen in an American-occupied zone in West Berlin, and yet the experience of racial division is laid bare. In fact, this image stylistically departs from his other American GI images at the Wall, as it is also the only image in Black in White America that presents racial division as static and impervious to interaction. Throughout the book, Freed locates fields of vision in order to wrestle with racial formation and his own whiteness. Freed acknowledges his role as a white photographer in America's racially divided society by encroaching on scenarios like this, to scrutinize his encounters with black subjects. Throughout the published book, he does so by balancing distance while moving closer to his subjects, registering their gazes in numerous directions, and marking mutual recognition without erasing social lines of division implicit or evident in his photographic encounters.
