

FIGURE 1.2 Cover, Leonard Freed, Black in White America, 1967/68. (Grossman/Estate of Leonard Freed)

Freed's Berlin Wall images and the trajectories that spring forth from them present photography as a tool to study relationships informed by race and the legacies of repression inscribed into Cold War and civil rights–era public spaces. His tactics of perspective at the Berlin Wall are informed by technical approaches and philosophical imperatives. In a technical photographic sense, perception marks the distance between photographer and subject, determined by the angle, framing, and relative distance between the camera and the focal point of the scene. As a concept, the word "perspective" also connotes a personal viewpoint informed by history, experience, and interaction. Curator William Ewing, in Freed's retrospective Worldview, explains the one-word title by means of its German cognate, Weltanschauung, and the parallel between Freed's practice as a photographer