image of a black GI within the broader currents of cultural history. While producing his respective studies of U.S. and German division, Freed would travel back and forth between the “old” and “new” Jewish worlds of Europe and America. In doing so, he produced book projects and challenged the underlying dichotomies of home and away, past and present, countryman and stranger. First, this chapter explores the larger context of the Berlin Crisis and the walling of Berlin by means of cultural productions, texts, and voices that sought to connect the German wall with the lines and legacies of American segregation. Second, it looks to Freed’s development as a photographer, especially how the city of Berlin, the country of Germany, and his breaks from exile in America informed an understanding of geopolitical division and identification in the context of transnational geopolitics and cultural memory. Third, the chapter closes with a consideration of Freed’s Black in White America and Made in Germany, alongside the moments he visited and viewed the Wall in subsequent trips to Germany as it further took shape in the city. Despite the separate emphases of each project, the fact that Freed took photographs across roughly the same period in overlapping territories affirms the shared productive contexts and tensions of these works. More specifically, Freed’s depiction of the Berlin Wall alongside other historical boundaries—especially those along the color line in America—as well as long-term processes of reconciliation in Germany, marks these projects as products of the same emergent practice of roving perspective and identification. Understanding where Freed locates the Berlin Wall, other historical structures or figures, and himself in each of these images allows us to measure his transformation as a photographer and his evolving view of the Wall and its connotations. Freed depicted the Wall’s surrounding urban and cultural landscapes, as he identified with and distanced himself from his subjects during these transatlantic travels. Freed’s images suggest he viewed the American post–World War II democratic project as a fragile construct, while jointly documenting Germany’s postwar landscapes and the color line back home.

In 1961 and beyond, as Americans were enthralled with tales of a divided Berlin in news and entertainment programming alike, the dividing crisis of segregation loomed.[10] Following the legal mandate to end segregation in public institutions in the 1954 unanimous Supreme Court decision in Brown
