

FIGURE 1.3 "The Wall," Pittsburgh Courier, January 20, 1962. (Pittsburgh Courier archives/ProQuest Historical Newspapers)

An editorial cartoon printed in the Pittsburgh Courier on January 20, 1962, also demonstrates the metaphorical grounds on which such linkages stood. Titled "The Wall" (fig. 1.3), the unsigned cartoon depicts a looming stone wall, behind which a visible skyline of a metropolis, labeled "The Promised Land," sits on its out-of-reach other side. In the foreground, figures labeled "U.S. Negroes" face blocks of stone inscribed with words such as "Unemployment," "Housing Bias," and "Votelessness." The accompanying editorial posits a forceful explanation of this scene: "The Wall that now divides East Berlin from West Berlin is as NOTHING compared to the wall that has long divided black America from white America." This symbolic visual portrayal marked the uncanny nature of the Berlin Wall, with distinction. "This American Wall is NOT insurmountable, but to MOST