how much distance from the lens to grant his subjects. In this case, his subjects were German Jews who had moved back to Germany or who converted to Judaism after the Holocaust. Freed's perspective demonstrates his feeling of affiliation, although he remained cautious about identifying fully with, or as, one of them—a discomfort that might have been tied to a sense of survivor's guilt because his family had lived in America during the Holocaust. To balance these feelings, at times he used a shallow depth of field to garner or approach a middle distance of intimacy with his subjects. Freed often positioned his camera to evenly sync with his subjects' fields of vision or, alternatively, take the position of a complete outsider, locating himself far out of intimate scenes in which he was seeking to make pictures. Freed tried to strike a balance between having access to his subjects (by virtue of his Jewish identity), which in itself represents a form of intimacy, while also wanting to show respect and space for their privacy.

When Freed photographed away from human subjects on these excursions in Germany, he tended to isolate himself and wander around the country's bygone Jewish spaces. He tried to conjure spaces from which to locate and relate to Germany's disappeared and murdered Jews. In one of the opening images of the book, he encounters a Jewish cemetery in Worms and the burial ground's uneven terrain (fig. 1.4). Shooting from a sloped position, he gives a sense of sprawling space. Here, the zigzag layout of the tombstones and the lack of a clear vanishing point serve formally to disorient viewers, as does the lack of context to clarify whether this burial ground was desecrated during the Holocaust. The ordering aspect of sunlight, entering the cemetery at an oblique angle, turns the tombstones into daggered shadows, while the absence of a photographer's shadow in this scene denies his presence. Freed accomplishes this by standing with the sun low and to his right, maximizing the light effects on the tombstones without having to stake a presence within the frame.

If Freed depicts the cemetery landscape in Worms with a sweeping, panoramic horizon, an earlier photograph in the book, taken at a walled boundary of the Dachau concentration camp, captures the specter of the Holocaust with a more confining, though similarly isolated perspective. This image was actually made on Freed's first trip to Europe in 1954 with a Rolleiflex camera rather than his Leica. Here Freed encounters the remains of latticed wood planks left lying amid trees and shrubs along the former "blood trenches." Like the rows of gravestones, the planks angle in a number
