of directions, except here they form a general line toward the vanishing point farther down the boundary wall. The base of the image is in soft focus, and, as several long blades of grass creep out at the bottom corners of the frame, Freed appears to have been kneeling or squatting. By locating himself in the brush and at the outer wall, Freed pushes his own vantage point to the edge. This image powerfully catches the photographer between the two roles he played while focusing on Germany's Jews: on one hand, a "landsman" staking out the history and reclaimed sacred grounds of his people; on the other, an outsider looking in, questioning his role and unsure of how to find a place for himself in post–Holocaust Germany.

FIGURE 1.4 Leonard Freed, Worms, 1961. (Estate of Leonard Freed/Magnum Photos)

Freed first traveled to Berlin in the late 1950s as part of his study of postwar Jewish communities. Of the more than fifty images in Deutsche Juden heute, approximately five were taken in Berlin, each taken in an indoor, enclosed space. The city's historic plazas and informal internal borders were not included within the scope of this project. Instead, he made portraits of notable Jewish families and cultural figures within their homes