FIGURE 1.5 Leonard Freed, Berlin, 1961. (Estate of Leonard Freed/Magnum Photos)

FIGURE 1.6 Leonard Freed, West Berlin, 1961. (Estate of Leonard Freed/Magnum Photos)

Given Freed's oblique views of the early days of the Berlin Wall in which he favored shots of American GIs over direct representations of the new border system, Freed's single exposure of an unnamed black American soldier guarding the Wall (see fig. 1.1), in which both the man and the Wall comprise the main focus, stands out as distinct. Though Freed included this photograph as the opening image in Black in White America—and not in Made in Germany, despite the fact that it was made in Berlin—the origins of this singular image and Freed's own conceptualization of it connect the photograph with his other Berlin Wall images. As noted, not only does this front-facing image of an American GI and the Wall he protects differ greatly from his other photographs made in the early days of the Berlin Wall; no other image in Black in White America seems to so deliberately refuse the potential for the photographer to "move closer," setting up the central imperative of the photobook.