Perhaps more instructive of the day's historical identity is one of his portraits from the aftermath of the event. Here Freed uses the Washington Monument again as an anchor (fig. 1.9). As the day closes and the crowd disperses, he stands behind and above a man who is sitting alone at the base of the Lincoln Memorial steps, looking outward. Debris from the march is littered around him. Freed finds the figure in a moment of stillness after the march, sitting on a low marble step padded with a folded newspaper, his gaze directed toward the monument. The contrast between the unobscured view of the monument on the immediate horizon and the man photographed from the back allows the viewer a moment of reflection informed by the subject's point of view.[37]

As a postscript to his march images, more than a year later, Freed photographed its keynote speaker, Dr. King, in a congratulatory Baltimore motorcade on October 31, 1964, after King was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. Freed had just returned from Europe, having come back to America to follow up on his work from the year before. After a summer in Deauville, France, with his family, Freed first stopped in Baltimore on a solo driving tour of the South. King, too, had just returned from Europe, where he visited Cold War Berlin.[38] His reception there—at once as a venerated visitor and a border-crossing representative of America—was paralleled in King's first celebration in America as a Nobel laureate. Freed devoted a full day to photographing King in Baltimore, including at a parade honoring him and a speech at a local synagogue.

Freed's photograph of King at the Baltimore motorcade is among the most notable images in Black in White America and has become prominent in itself as a portrait of King (fig. 1.10).[39] Although King is the central figure of this photograph, Freed captures many of the faces in the crowd around him. Freed's perspective conjures his approach to the march the year before, rendering the variable distances and relationships that frame the scene. When we consider where Freed was probably standing to make this picture, we might conclude that the photographer was so close he could have reached out to touch the car in which King was riding. (Freed very rarely used telephoto lenses, and his other images from this day attest to the fact that he was in close proximity using his preferred 50mm lens.) Such a positioning could bring Freed "closer" to King (either physically or perceived) and allow the photographer to mitigate any notions of separation. Yet the blurred profile of a face at the far right edge of the frame suggests that Freed's
