position in the crowd may have been farther away than it first appears. Whether the shadowy figure on the right is standing next to Freed or simply moving into his frame is indeterminable. The effect, however, demonstrates that Freed's perspective either approximates or accounts intimately for this figure's perspective and proximity to King. On closer examination, it is feasible that this image registers King in a moment of mutual recognition with the blurred figure (or, peripherally, with Freed). If Black in White America was conceived as a project that set out to map American spaces of spatial division and identification, Freed's images here and throughout this body of work push for a balance between marking shared spaces of recognition and valuing African American figures' distinct fields of visions.