FIGURE 1.9 Leonard Freed, Washington, D.C., 1963. (Estate of Leonard Freed/Magnum Photos)

FIGURE 1.10 Leonard Freed, Baltimore, 1964. (Estate of Leonard Freed/Magnum Photos)

In the images that would later comprise Made in Germany (1970), made mostly in 1961–65 and concurrent with the production of Black in White America, Freed again favors photographing social settings. This was a way to encompass a sense of the public at large. Here, in contrast to his German Jewish and American civil rights images, respectively, he immersed himself in crowds and built spaces. These photographs show Freed attempting to come to terms with Germany and its history, face-to-face and encounter-by-encounter, but also drawing the photographer's own critical distance. He negotiates his stance by meeting people at public squares, parks, nudist colonies, schools, and industrial worksites, all of which seem to demonstrate Freed's ability to wander around freely and look at Germans. In the vein of one of Freed's photographic influences, German photographer August Sander, he set out to photograph a broad swath of Germans in their occupational or leisure contexts.[40] But as he draws attention to the many "types" in Germany, as Sander did, he also focuses on buildings that still