FIGURE 1.12 Leonard Freed, Tegernsee, 1965. (Estate of Leonard Freed/Magnum Photos)

As noted, the eventual Made in Germany book resembles Black in White America in many respects. This similarity is attributed to the fact that Freed and his wife laid out both books one after the other and had them printed by the same printing house in Holland.[42] They also share an American publisher, Richard Grossman. But deeper and more conceptually, they read like twin photographic records of Freed's travels, with photographs used as visual maps and captions offering personalized directions. The photographs and their treatments resemble one another not only in his use of perspective but also in the way he plays with distance and proximity to his subjects. In many of them we can find the photographer at the margins of his own images, locating himself in relation to the people he photographs. Across these two nationally framed projects, Freed's photographic landscapes intersect in Berlin by the Wall. The two books, Black in White America and Made in Germany, rely on physical, architectural walls to exemplify deeply ingrained social boundaries that are also simultaneously sites of traversal and distinction.

The work of identification in Black in White America involves shrinking the space between a white Jewish photographer and his black subjects in varying social contexts; in Made in Germany, alienation is paced by an attempt to acknowledge and approach but also remain steadfast in memory. Such approaches allow Freed to move at the same time toward several goals that seem incompatible: encroach on the social buffers imposed by the legacy of racial segregation and wartime destruction; acknowledge the ongoing existence of racial strife and indifference in need of redress; seek connection with African Americans and Germans; and all the while mark the profound wounds of his people and his own nation.

The image of the unnamed black American soldier at the Berlin Wall, in effect, frames Freed's project as conditioned on a recognition of racial distances and social boundaries in Berlin. By making that frontal portrait, set at a middle distance with the Wall in the background, Freed ends up squarely facing the concrete structure at a cautious middle distance—a distance that through the rest of Black in White America he attempts to redress. In Made in Germany, he begins closer to his subjects but obscures direct views of the Wall amidst his other questions and explorations of the postwar German landscape. The relative visibility of walls and boundaries in this body of