mobility are presented in tension with how he captures, in both image and text, the nagging fixedness of color-line geographies, as black citizens are denied the same freedoms he is afforded. The Berlin Wall pictured in this book, by then a fixture and symbol of a divided Germany, was only weeks old when Freed first photographed it. The photographer's subjects in this formulation are rendered as if timeless, fixed to their depictions, locations, and circumstances.[48]

For Made in Germany, Freed's other project from this period, the book title is branded through a capitalized, stencil-styled typeface that was used on the cover. The title thus doubles as a mantra that is echoed in the author/photographer's captioned descriptions throughout. He uses the same formulation in his introduction, in succession and in all capital letters. His repeated uses of the refrain "Made in Germany" are separated through an ongoing series of ellipses. Though the project is obviously marked by the specific historical moment of a postwar, divided Germany, Freed expresses the liminal nature of his photobook in regard to these fractures: "MADE IN GERMANY … let us retrogress in time and read. MADE IN WEST GERMANY … or still further in time and read, MADE IN THE AMERICAN OCCUPIED ZONE OF GERMANY." This sentiment is also echoed when he brings up the Berlin Wall for the first time: "MADE IN GERMANY means … know your history and geography. … Berlin, controlled by four occupying powers, has its 'Berlin Wall' running through and around it … stamped MADE IN GERMANY."[49]

The reviews of Made in Germany again reference Freed as a traveler. But the tone of his work is seen as more suspect of his subjects than their contexts. In an article titled "Pictures You Won't See in a Travel Folder," the New York Times writer Gene Thornton praises Freed for his mastery of the photo-text but emphasizes the discomfort and quiet menace captured there. "Instead of picturesque castles and smiling peasant girls, Freed gives us grinning mobs, somber landscapes, traffic jams, clean cut kids wearing iron crosses or throwing rocks in the streets." Thornton reads a warning in Freed's photographs and captions: "You will get the impression that they [the Germans] are all somehow peculiar to the Vriendly Volks from across the Rhine who gave us You Know Who, and You Better Watch Out, Or They'll Try it Again."[50] Although Freed cautions in his text, "what will be of Germany in twenty-five years," his images do not simply reflect a distrust of or attribute inherent danger to Germans. Freed wants to understand the profound changes of the nation and its people, set against the backdrop of
