Cold War division and postwar rebuilding. Freed's subjects are depicted as dynamically attached to history through the land, whichever side of the Wall they may live on. Freed roves as he meets Germans in their personal spaces, at their sites of mourning and community building, and attempts to reconcile his own struggles of religious and national identity. Again, his mobility, in contrast with the newly built Berlin Wall, which prohibits free movement across the border, creates a context for Freed to grapple with post–Holocaust Germany, his place as an American within it, and, in turn, his recognition of division back home.

Freed continued in a career of constant movement, in and out of America. Berlin was one of his most visited sites of return. Visibly displaying the scars of postwar Germany, the city of Berlin occupies a special place in Freed's work. He continued photographing the Berlin Wall from its early years through its years as a staunch border. In 1976 he lived in a flat in the artist co-op Künstlerhaus Bethanien, with a window that overlooked the Wall, as he photographed for a book on Berlin published by Time-Life. In 1984 he immersed himself in a Turkish community in Kreuzberg for a photo-essay, including photo shoots at the border and others embedded in the neighborhood and family culture. Beyond the Cold War, the Berlin Wall symbolized for Freed the many legacies of division and conflict running across the different epochs of modern Germany. The Wall also continued to help Freed visualize the social barriers that defined American society.

His enduring, complex views about American culture and the Berlin Wall may be most clearly evoked in a noteworthy set of textual reflections that appear near the end of Made in Germany. Freed's critical distancing in his books included moments when he recognized that photographs alone could not convey what he experienced. As he recalled in another caption in the book, "When the photographs do not show what [the photographer] has seen, it is not the reality but the inadequacy of the photographer and his tools to blame."[51] Freed noted that more context could be indexed beyond the frame of any produced visual encounter.

To extend this, Freed recounts a series of "traumas" (also used as the title of this section) that he experienced during his time in Germany. There are no images in this section and no titles beyond a numbered order, and none of the anecdotes in the text explicitly corresponds to photographs found elsewhere in the book. Freed did not include any photographs of concentration camps, as he had in Deutsche Juden heute, but instead
