disappears from the news but for years continues to rage, world public opinion is being conditioned to accept rebel victory as inevitable and pre-destined."[4]

2. Destroying the enemy's economy.
3. Promoting anti-militarism and encouraging defections from the army, stimulation of desertion and mutiny.[5]
4. "Mass terror as a 'psychological' operation to weaken the enemy's forces and morale, and strengthen the guerillas."[6]
5. Securing intelligence and denying intelligence to the enemy.[7]

An insurgent group must somehow stay in existence; modulate the pace of hostilities; and secure and maintain safe sanctuaries and mobility. As an example, the real importance of Gaza in this equation is as a strategic enclave. This was the case of Cambodia during the Vietnam War; it served as a sanctuary from which men and supplies could move to the front.

When we consider the tactics of political warfare, we must bear in mind that there are several fronts: 1) the actual front of direct confrontation; 2) behind the enemy lines, where one tries to destroy sources of political support of the enemy; and 3) world opinion. Within this framework, some possible tactics could include a program of destabilizing a country internally by gaining control of its institutions for molding public attitudes and ultimately bringing about change by a combination of non-military and violent means. This was the method advocated by Antonio Gramsci, the Italian Communist theoretician and friend of Lenin. Important social institutions to be captured include the intellectual elite, the educational system, the media, cinema, popular culture, and ultimately, the bureaucracy. Three major examples of successful political warfare include the undermining of the legitimacy of the Weimar Republic by the Nazi party (with Stalin's connivance),[8] which led to Hitler's seizure of power on 30 January 1933; the campaign by the Viet Cong and their collaborators to use the news media to undermine domestic American support for the war in Vietnam; and the toppling of the Soviet Union and Eastern bloc governments in the face of local opposition to its policies from trades unions and dissidents, and the powerful voices of U.S. President Ronald Reagan, UK Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, and the charismatic Polish Pope John Paul II.

The recent development of the field of genocide studies provides refined analytical tools, particularly with regard to causation. Gregory Stanton, a pioneering scholar in this field, demonstrated that incitement, which he termed "dehumanization," is one of the eight progressive stages leading to genocide.[9] Dehumanization is similar to incitement (whose main principle is to cause others to perpetrate a crime). Functionally, they both provide "the
