Walt and John Mearsheimer's book, The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy.[16] In addition, front groups have been created, such as Breira, an initiative launched in the 1970s, and, more recently, J Street, whose purpose is to divide and undermine the consensus of support for Israel within the American Jewish community.

The most dramatic expression of anti-Zionist activity on a large scale was the UN World Conference against Racism which took place in Durban, South Africa from August 31 to September 7, 2001. Here, the enemies of Israel sought to revive UN General Assembly Resolution 3375, that "Zionism is Racism," and to isolate the Jewish state internationally.[17] At this conference, the Palestinians and their allies endeavored to attain by political means what they had failed to achieve through the organized violence and terror of the Second Intifada, launched in 2000. Not surprisingly, their strategic objective was the liquidation of Israel over a long time-frame, and their approach reflected the alliance between the African National Congress and the Palestine Authority. Their model was the defeat of white South Africa, and they intended (and still intend) to apply the same strategy against Israel. Their goals may be found in the eight-point Durban Program which Shimon Samuels described in an interview of 2003.[18] The experience of Durban paved the way for future anti-Zionist initiatives which emerged during the first decade of this century, notably the BDS movement and aggressive new forms of campus agitation such as Israel Apartheid Week.[19] In this context, we may cite the French scholar, Pierre André Taguieff, who observed:

> We may conclude that, by the late 1990s, PLO propaganda had largely achieved its objective of saturating international public opinion with its vocabulary and its imagery, of imbuing the most diverse national aspirations and sentiments with "anti-Zionist" convictions inseparable from, and intensified by, an unconditionally anti-Israeli, pro-Palestinian reflex of indignation. The intended result was to monopolize legitimate appeals to right and justice in an international context. . . .[20]

Political warfare must be understood in terms of its real goal, its telos, or ultimate result, which is destruction and regime change. It must not be confused with public relations, marketing, branding, bikinis on the beach, the excitement of the "start-up nation," or the good nightlife in Tel-Aviv. Political warfare is a deadly serious business.

Anti-Zionism as an Ideological Program

If we examine the doctrine of anti-Zionism, we find that it possesses a belief system with clearly-defined ideological articles of faith. The fundamental
