A report by the Scottish Jewish Community Council of 10 August 2014 provides us with a look at these antisemitic outbursts and the expressions of Israel-hate emerging from Scottish institutions. The Council had received reports about twelve antisemitic incidents that occurred in the previous week, "almost as many as in the whole of 2013." Those reported to the police included threatening phone-calls, e-mails and graffiti on synagogues, as well as two cases of incitement to break the law." The report detailed the fears of Jews and Israelis living in Scotland.

The Community Council's report goes on to provide a number of examples of how public representatives have an "obsession" with Israel. In the current parliamentary period there had been 260 parliamentary motions concerning countries outside the U.K, of which 50 related to Israel. The next in line was Malawi, with only 14 motions, and thereafter came Syria, South Africa, and Iraq, each with 12 motions. There were no double figures for any other country.

The report continues by stating that after 9 July, there had been eight Scottish Government statements about Gaza. Since January 2013, there had been only four Scottish Government statements about Syria. The Scottish Human Rights Council made three separate statements about the Gaza conflict after 16 July. Since its establishment, the Council has made seven statements about countries outside the U.K.—of which six concerned Israel.[11]

Israel as a Prism for the United Nations

Israel can provide an excellent prism for understanding the distorted modus operandi of the United Nations and of many of its associated bodies. David Ben-Gurion described the United Nations succinctly by calling it the "Theatre of the Absurd" more than fifty years ago.

Irwin Cotler, who later became the Minister of Justice of Canada, said in 2003 that the United Nations Relief and Refugee Work Agency (UNRWA) was a "corrupted dimension of the United Nations." He stated, "This institution is supposed to work for the relief of refugees. Under its supervision and management, the refugee camps became part of the culture of incitement as well as bomb factories."[12] During the 2014 Protective Edge campaign, rockets were found in several UNRWA schools.

One UN organization in which anti-Israel hate promotion can be seen most clearly is the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC). It has condemned Israel more times than any other nation, including the most criminal human rights abusers. In looking at its warped emphasis on Israel,
