Thus we find that Israel is frequently berated for measures it takes to defend its own citizens. Palestinian responsibility for making that necessary is minimized or ignored altogether. This is true even for crimes such as suicide bombings, rocket attacks, promoting genocide, glorification of the murderers of Israeli civilians, and for massive incitement, much of which echoes Nazi hate propaganda. Similarly, many of those who oppose Islamophobia in the Western world engage in racist double standards when they remain silent about the widespread antisemitism in Muslim communities.

EUROPE

When using the aforementioned prisms to analyze the European Union, one can better understand both their value and limitations. Much is radically wrong with the EU, but the prisms proposed here do not help one understand the unrestrained growth of the power of the European bureaucracy, the imprudent geographic expansion of the EU, or the key error of introducing the Euro as common currency.

One can, however, understand another major mistake of many EU countries. Over the past decades, European countries have indiscriminately let in many millions of Muslims from non-democratic nations, where antisemitism, both in its classic forms and in its anti-Israeli dimension, is rampant. In addition, many of the cultures represented by these immigrants cannot tolerate the least criticism or satirical comment about their religion, traditions, or ways of life.

Allowing such a large influx from dictatorial, hate-filled, and discriminatory environments into Europe has played a major role in fuelling the increase of European antisemitism. The results of this disastrous European policy is a new form of state-enabled antisemitism.

Europe's double standards are evident from counting its many condemnations of Israel and comparing them with those concerning other countries. The European Union is a frequent perpetrator of double standards, which, according to the working definition of antisemitism by the European Fundamental Rights Agency (FRA), is itself an antisemitic act.[20] The sudden abolition of this definition by the FRA in 2013 can be considered yet another act aiding antisemites.

The dubious character of international law can be further established by observing its application toward Israel by the European Union. The EU claims that Israeli settlements are illegal. More than a thousand prominent lawyers from many countries signed a document stating that the settlements are, in fact, legal. This document was sent to several high officials of the
