persecution "provided they . . . are not Zionists owing allegiance to a foreign power."[49] Neither the far left nor the far right showed the slightest interest in gaining compensation for Sephardi and Mizrahi Jews who lost everything when Arab and Muslim nations forced them to leave.

Both the far left and far right adamantly denied any Jewish historical ties to what they called Palestine. Fire, the Weatherman organ, in 1969 described the ancient Hebrews as invaders whose "occupation" of Judaea had been brief and intermittent. The Black Panthers claimed that Hebrews were latecomers to "the land of Canaan, later called Palestine," and had remained there only "for 100 years," while the "Palestinians" had maintained a continuous presence until the Zionists expelled them in 1948.[50] Similarly, on the far right, Women's Voice declared that "there is no question who has lived in Palestine for the last 2,000 years—it is the Arabs." The Jews, an insignificant presence until very recently, had "no title to Palestine whatsoever."[51] Freda Utley ridiculed claims of Jews' historic ties to Palestine in Will the Middle East Go West? Coughlin's Social Justice stated that until World War I, "the whole country was Arabic." It insisted in 1938 that Mandate Palestine had been created only for those residing there in 1917. There was no intention of transplanting Jews "from the four corners of the globe. . . . into an already inhabited country."[52]

The similarity of the demonization of the Jewish state by the far left and far right was once again demonstrated in their condemnation of Israel's military campaign against the Gaza-based Arab terrorist group Hamas in the summer of 2014. Both far left and far right invoked long-standing antisemitic stereotypes of bloodthirsty Zionists inflicting atrocities on innocent Palestinians that resembled or even exceeded those of the Nazis.

Both the far left and far right help shape public attitudes toward Israel in the United States, even though the former has diminished greatly in size since the early 1970s, and the latter wields significant influence largely among African Americans, through the Nation of Islam (NOI). The contemporary American far left is mostly composed of small quasi-Trotskyist and Maoist sects that are active mainly on university campuses. These sects' rabid anti-Zionism has led them to forge alliances with Muslim students, a much larger group in the universities. Together the groups join in regularly disrupting pro-Israel speakers. The contemporary white far right consists largely of neo-Nazis, who have little visibility on campus but reach millions of Americans through the Internet. The black racist NOI, led by Louis Farrakhan,
