movement to boycott German goods and services, in which American Zionists were heavily engaged by the fall of 1933.

In August 1933, the eighteenth World Zionist Congress, held in Prague, drew together Jews from around the world in a forceful denunciation of Nazi antisemitic policies and atrocities. In opening the Congress, Dr. Nahum Sokolow, president of the World Zionist Organization, warned that German Jews' existence was "now at the mercy of the axe."[61] The assembled Zionists were determined to coordinate protests and rescue operations for German Jewry underway in various countries. Zionists' fierce opposition to Nazism was reflected in the Congress's refusing for the first time to use German as its official language, "though there [was] no other language . . . so universally understood by the delegates."[62]

By contrast, the far left and far right have enthusiastically backed Arab regimes led by dictators who had supported the Hitler regime and provided refuge to hundreds of Nazi war criminals after the Third Reich collapsed. Arab countries placed Nazi war criminals in important political and military positions. During Israel's War of Independence, Arab armies recruited Wehrmacht veterans. Arab leaders repeatedly made genocidal threats against Israel's Jews, dismissed or trivialized by right and left. The Arab regimes and terrorist movements backed by the far left and far right distribute antisemitic tracts favored by the Nazis, such as the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. Like neo-Nazi groups everywhere, they promote Holocaust denial.

NOTES

1. Eunice G. Pollack, "African Americans and the Legitimization of Antisemitism on Campus" in Antisemitism on the Campus: Past & Present, edited by Eunice G. Pollack (Boston: Academic Studies Press, 2011), 222.

2. Stephen H. Norwood, Antisemitism and the American Far Left (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2013), 221.

3. Leonard Dinnerstein, Antisemitism in America (New York: Oxford University Press, 1994), ix; Brooklyn Jewish Examiner, 17 Dec. 1933; Chicago Defender, 16 Mar. and 27 Apr. 1946; "The Coudert Committee and Bigotry," n.d., box 8, Morris Schappes Papers, Center for Jewish History, American Jewish Historical Society, New York. The Catholic-dominated Boston City Council in 1944 rejected a proposal to incorporate material on religious intolerance in the public school curriculum. Chicago Defender, 1 Jan. 1944. In 1948, one of New York's largest and most prominent public high schools banned what at the time were the two leading novels critical of American antisemitism: Arthur Miller's Focus and Laura Z. Hobson's Gentleman's Agreement. The New York Board of Education's high school division publicly endorsed the principal's decision to ban both books. New York Times, 12 Feb. 1948.

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,