criticized the BDS movement for its hypocrisy and bad faith in masking its desire for Israel's extinction.

Another form of anti-Zionism is exhibited by the Anglo-Jewish psychiatrist cum literary critic, Jacqueline Rose. In her book, The Question of Zion, Rose has trouble finding words sufficiently trenchant to render the diseased and demonic nature of Zionism.[40] She variously describes the movement as "bloody," "defiled," "deadly," "cursed," "corrupt," "cruel," "blind," "fanatical," and responsible for the ruin of Judaism's moral heritage—which it has comprehensively betrayed. Virtually no contemporary platitude or libels about the Jewish State are left unmentioned—including the implication that the Israeli army deliberately kills Palestinian children. An innocent reader would scarcely imagine that Israel is an open and thriving democracy surrounded by an imploding Arab world sunk in economic backwardness, mass illiteracy, savage tyranny, civil wars, and religious fanaticism. What is clear to Rose, however, is that Israel is bad news for Diaspora Jews—threatening their safety, their peace of mind, and sanity. Zionism is presented as an extremely dangerous messianic delusion, "a form of collective insanity." Rose's nightmarish vision of Zionism is in fact one of unremitting cruelty—an ideology that bears within itself the "seeds of catastrophe" and untold suffering for the Palestinians. Naturally, this invective is accompanied by the obligatory equation between Zionism and German antisemitism. Rose's book even claims that Herzl and the young Hitler listened to Wagner's music on the same evening in Paris (May 1895)—inspiring the Zionist leader "to write Der Judenstaat, and Hitler [to compose] Mein Kampf."[41] Since Adolf Hitler had only just celebrated his sixth birthday, this would suggest that the Nazi mass murderer was indeed a true Wunderkind.

Not to be outdone by such prodigious fabrications, there are also vocal Israelis who specialize in denouncing their country, especially at events like "Israel Apartheid Week." Among them, there is the historian Ilan Pappe—now an expatriate in England—who helped to spearhead the ongoing British effort to boycott Israeli universities. For Pappe, Israeli "ethnic cleansing" began in the 1948 war. It was a long-premeditated crime ruthlessly implemented and then systematically denied.[42] Indeed, the whole story of the Zionist enterprise in Palestine is, for Pappe and his ilk, nothing but a tale of occupation, expulsion, discrimination, and racism perpetrated on totally innocent Arabs by alien "Jewish" invaders.[43] The Palestinians are permanent victims, the Zionists forever "brutal colonizers" in this massively distorted narrative. Hence, it is no surprise to discover that Pappe, like Judith Butler, Chomsky, and Finkelstein, exhibits warm feelings for such "progressive"
