abolished—it is allegedly "the mirror image of Hitler." Burg warns that Israelis have become psychic cripples, gripped by dread and fear because of Hitler's Holocaust.[46] The Israeli preoccupation with Islamic radicalism and terror is absurdly reduced to Jewish paranoia. Indeed, Israel is not merely a traumatized, militaristic, and racist society, but one that is approaching the abyss of Nazism. Burg can even visualize a future in which the Israeli parliament passes legislation forbidding sexual relations between Jews and Arabs. By contrast, he has visualized the European Union (EU) as a miraculous "biblical utopia," "completely Jewish" in the best cosmopolitan sense of the term—the living antithesis of Israel's regressive "chauvinism," provincialism, and supposed spiritual sterility. However, the massive economic crisis that has overtaken the EU in recent years, its cultural pessimism, terrorist threats, and the rise of far right populist parties as well as increasing Europhobia across the continent, have exposed the grotesque fallacies in Burg's inverted vision of the world.

The super-elitist contempt for ordinary Israeli citizens to be found in writings like those of Burg or in the columns of Haaretz newspaper, strikes me as more narcissistic than self-hating. What is extrordinary is that the contemporary anti-Zionists (whether Jewish or non-Jewish) claim a monopoly of the moral high ground while explaining away Palestinian or Islamist suicide terrorism or trivializing antisemitism. The rhetoric is often highflown ("justice," "humanity," and "Jewish ethics") but the emotional world just beneath the surface seems spiteful and splenetic. The new breed of Jewish Israel-baiters even when (re)claiming their Jewishness appear to be pathologically obsessed with delegitimizing their "parochial," "tribalist," and "chauvinist" co-religionists. They have reversed the old patriotic cliché: "My fatherland, right or wrong," replacing it with the even more absurd axiom: "My country, always wrong." They seem to have forgotten that without Israel they, too, would be completely expendable.

NOTES

1. See Robert S. Wistrich, The Jews of Vienna in the Age of Franz Joseph (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989), 488–93. The original text Eine Krone für Zion (Vienna 1898) can be found in Karl Kraus, Frühe Schriften, 1892–1900, vol. 2: 1897–1900 (Munich 1979).

2. On Austerlitz, see Wistrich, Jews of Vienna, 508.

3. For the dialogue between Jellinek and Pinsker, see Adolf Jellinek, Aus der Zeit: Tagesfragen und Tagesbegenheiten (Budapest 1886), 20–81; Wistrich, Jews of Vienna, 462–63.

4. Rabbi Moritz Güdemann to Frau Kamilla Theimer, 19 Dec. 1907, Central Archives of the History of the Jewish People, Jerusalem, /A/W 731.5. Güdemann's

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,