But the American ambassador to the UN did not mention the perpetrators. Who killed the Jews in Toulouse? Who killed four people in Brussels at the Jewish museum, and who attacked the Wuppertal Synagogue with fire-bombs? Muslims, jihadists, Islamists, and Arabs. But Samantha Power did not even once mention Muslim antisemitism, Islamism, or Arab antisemites during her talk in Berlin. Neo-Nazis, though, were mentioned:

> In April, on the eve of Passover, a neo-Nazi opened fire outside a Jewish community center and assisted living home called Village Shalom in Kansas City. He killed three people.[2]

This is not merely a diplomatic reluctance to mention a specific group of perpetrators. Neo-Nazis are also a specific group of people and they are named by Samantha Power. But Islamist or Arab antisemities, who comprise a large group compared to neo-Nazis, are ignored. Why is that so? This might be part of American "inclusiveness" as it is sometimes called. Ambassador Power emphasized that her delegation consists of many groups, including Muslims, homosexuals, and Jewish representatives.[3] This is fine as long as it does not result in the rather typical European, American, or left-of-center reluctance to face the real problem of Judeophobia in the early 21st century, which is Muslim and Arab antisemitism.

Instead of confronting this issue, Samantha Power referred to the highly questionable trope of "Islamophobia." She even compared the Holocaust to the war in Yugoslavia and Serbs to Nazis—without even mentioning Islamism in Bosnia—a remarkable blind spot. Moreover, what does the mention of Sarajevo have to do with antisemitism today? Power also distorted the pro-Iranian stance of EU and American policies. Not once did she evoke radical Islam as the main cause for today's crisis in the Middle East. Islam and Muslims appear as victims, but never as perpetrators. Nor was there any reference in her Berlin speech to contemporary German nationalism. She seems to be unaware of how eager Germans are these days to forget the Holocaust and focus on a common European day of remembrance promoting the equivalence between Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union. Germans share this outlook with the Baltic states and much of Eastern Europe.

These omissions, so typical of today's political elite in the Western world, are also reflected in contemporary academia, which has singularly failed to understand the deep cultural roots and centrality of antisemitism in modern history. Robert Wistrich rightly called antisemitism the "longest hatred" in 1991 and analysed it as a "lethal obsession" in 2010.[5] Already in his book Hitler's Apocalypse (1985), he sharply argued against those who downplayed the role that antisemitism and an apocalyptic worldview played in the ideology of Hitler during his early years in Vienna, where it fused with pan-

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,