German nationalism and Slavophobia.[6] During his Vienna years, Hitler also developed his loathing for the class struggle, proletarian internationalism, and Marxian Socialism, which he came to see as a Jewish conspiracy.[7] In the postwar world, as Robert Wistrich demonstrated, it was Arab nationalists and Muslim fundamentalists who inherited Hitler's legacy.

Arab Rejectionism and the Binational Option

A core aspect of the Arab-Israeli conflict is the Arab rejection of Israel as a Jewish state. Palestine Arabs rejected the partition plan of the British Peel Commission in 1937, and refuse to accept what they call the "Zionist entity." Yet, instead of deconstructing this Arab rejectionism or analyzing Arab and Islamist antisemitism, many scholars prefer to blame the Jews or Israel for the standoff. One example comes from German mainstream scholarship. Christian Wiese, a former Christian priest, is now Martin Buber Professor for Jewish Philosophy of Religion at the Goethe University in Frankfurt. In 2006, Wiese wrote an article for the Leo Baeck Institute's Yearbook about Robert Weltsch, the long time UK correspondent of Haaretz, a founding member of the Leo Baeck Institute in 1956, and first editor of the widely-esteemed Yearbook.[7] In his article, Wiese quotes approvingly from Jacqueline Rose's anti-Zionist book, The Question of Zion, where she writes that Hitler and Theodor Herzl attended the very same concert of Wagner's music in Paris, after which Hitler was "inspired" to write Mein Kampf, and Herzl, Der Judenstaat. Yet in May 1895, Hitler was but six years old; he first came to France in 1940 with the German Wehrmacht! Everyone knows that—except for Jacqueline Rose and her followers. But Wiese refers to Rose approvingly and even quotes the very chapter with that lie in it. Rose also deals with Jewish thinkers like Ahad Ha'am, Gershom Scholem, Martin Buber, Hans Kohn, and Hannah Arendt.[8] Typically, both Wiese and Rose ignore Gershom Scholem's shift from cultural to political Zionist in the mid-1930s, as I have shown in my latest book on Critical Theory and Israel.[9] They focus only on Scholem as a member of the Brit Shalom group between 1925 and 1933. But Scholem passionately supported the Jewish state and was shocked by the Arab rejection of the 1937 Peel Commission plan. Like Kurt Blumenfeld, a former head of the Zionist Federation of Germany, he was equally shocked by Hannah Arendt's vitriolic 1946 article, "Zionism Reconsidered," which aggressively attacked the movement she had once supported. But those scholars today who support the bi-national ideology once espoused by Brit Shalom, utterly fail to see how anachronistic and disconnected from historical reality it already was in the 1930s, let alone

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,