state to be replaced by a binational state and, unambiguously, for "the end of Zionism."[20] She claims she cannot understand why her positions are criticized by Jews, since she is merely applying a Jewish precept based on the ethic of non-violence.[21]

When it comes to Israel's wars, public opinion can too easily slide into previously hidden antisemitic prejudice. Nobody forgets that Israel is a Jewish state, with all its attendant implications. "You reap what you have sown," a French feminist said: "Since Israel declares that it is the state of all the Jews, don't be too surprised when you find you must bear the consequences."[22] We see a tendency to ignore the anguish of the Israeli side, on the grounds that Israel has a strong military and can defend itself. What then of the United States, with all its military and economic power, which saw on 9/11 the demonstration of its own vulnerability when confronted by the murderous madness of a handful of terrorists. Israel, which given its small landmass and its hostile surroundings is infinitely more fragile, must in addition respond to both Diaspora and world expectations that it provide a "moral example."

In France, where the Jewish community has strong ties to Israel, we can also find examples of Jewish women and men involved in anti-Israel and pro-Palestinian activism. Their activism often slips into antisemitism, as we can see within two organizations led by Jewish women. The CAPJPO-Europalestine is an NGO dedicated to ending the "occupation of the Palestinian territories" and the boycott of Israeli products (BDS, Boycott Désinvestissement Sanctions), founded in 2002 by Olivia Zemor.[23] In 2012, Zemor, herself Jewish, was condemned "for incitement to racial hatred and violence" and had to pay a symbolic one Euro of damages to the Office of Vigilance against Antisemitism (BNVCA) and to the chamber of commerce France-Israel.[24] The French Court ruled that her assertion that "to buy a product from Israel is equivalent to buying a bullet which will kill a Palestinian child," is antisemitic and thus prohibited by French Law.[25]

A second example is the "Jewish Union for Peace" (Union juive française pour la Paix – UJFP), created in 1990, invoking "A world without Zionism" (Un monde sans sionisme), a pro-Palestinian and an organization which is a BDS supporter. Its Jewish spokeswoman and vice-president, Michele Sibony, collaborates actively with the Islamist website Uma.com against Israel, as seen recently during the Israeli "Protective Edge" operation in Gaza in July 2014. The virulent antisemitism which burst out during the pro-Palestinian demonstrations in Paris does not concern her; she is prepared to testify that the Jews are guilty of the attacks against their own synagogues(!).
