Rue 89, Sibony asserts that the demo was "FOR-MI-DABLE" and that she did not see any antisemitic act or slogan. It was all a provocation of the "Ligue de défense juive."[26]

Reports in left French newspapers like Libération and Nouvel Observateur, usually critical of Israel, described the disturbing antisemitism observed by their journalists during the demos in Paris. Another Rue 89 journalist, Pascal Riché, reported his conversation with Loubna, Amel, and Sarah, three young women who joined the demonstrations in Paris on Saturday, July 17, 2014,that took place despite being forbidden:

> What most frightened me this Saturday was the antisemitism, very frequent in the language of the young people. I have never heard so many antisemitic sentences in so short a time.
>
> One girl said: "Anyway, they control everything." I ask, with an innocent air: "Who is 'they'?" The girl, as if I was stupid: "Come on..., the Jews!"

Pascal Riché concluded with deep concern: "Israelis, the Israeli government, Zionists, Jews, everything is mixed up in a miserable heavy fog. Who will clarify all that in these heads? It is urgent."[27]

Here we see the danger of ignorance and confusion, which leads to frighteningly antisemitic hate speech, conveyed by a new generation with little or no knowledge of history, and no empathy for the Jewish people—considered guilty by definition. Hannah Arendt once declared political ignorance to be the worst thing, something no individual can afford, and that applies today especially to opinions about the Jews.

In light of the massive worldwide disinformation evident before and during "Protective Edge," in particular the casual use of the term "genocide" along with comparisons of the Israeli army with Nazis, some feminists broke their silence over the obsessive condemnations of Israel.

The British feminist Ayala Prager, who studies "Comparative Narratives of Genocide and Mass Violence" at University College London decided to relaunch her blog, The Girls Make Noise with a post addressing "a linguistic irregularity; namely, the ever-increasing claim that Israel is guilty of enacting 'genocide' upon the people of Gaza."

> My issue with claims of Israeli-perpetrated genocide, however, transcends the irritation caused by this semiotic misapplication alone. To me, the bigger danger implied by the word "genocide" and its link to the current conflict is the Holocaust equivalence that is being propagated every time it is spoken. Twitter is awash with outraged sentiments that appear to equate the two: "Israel will make sure the world never forgets the Holocaust… [re-enacting it] in Palestine,"

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,