> cries one—"No one denies the Holocaust of WWII but there are people denying the 21st century holocaust by the Israelis against Gaza," claims another. . . .[28]

French feminist activists such as Claudie Lessellier, Catherine Deudon, and Christine Le Doaré, joined the discussion around this question, and the issue of the many antisemitic acts that had occurred during the Paris demonstrations, in which some of their feminist friends had participated.

In her blog Irréductiblement féministe" (Implacably feminist), Christine Le Doaré considers, according to "a feminist reading of the situation," that "this entire warrior energy, this male chauvinist violence" is "purely and simply a matter of male domination." Hence, she cannot understand why feminists insist on contributing to the export of this conflict to France. Regarding Israel, she added:

> Why do certain feminists parade behind banners: "Total support for Gaza "? To support Gaza en bloc, is it not to support the terrorist authority which manipulates it? Why do they take the risk of getting involved with the Islamo-fascists and revive this grotesque fable of "genocide in Gaza," when Israel has no desire for ethnic eradication [of Palestinians] and the notion of genocide has very precise legal criteria?[29]

Some days later, when a seventy-two hour cease-fire was declared and negotiations began in Cairo, Christine Le Doaré wrote a new "feminist" analysis of the events:

> August 5, Updated
>
> I was disappointed by the analysis of the situation by most of the feminists who expressed themselves on the question and who also--following the example of leftist groups or of the PC [French Communist Party] have remained motionless since the 1970s—still clinging to a nostalgic fantasized representation of Palestine. I did not understand why they did not condemn, above all, the political instrumentalization of religions, the male chauvinist motivations of control of the populations by power-hungry men, the obscurantism, the violence of all kinds, and the destruction. I did not understand why they tried to read the conflict through outdated "leftist" analyses, rather than through a feminist key; and why they took a stand with one camp or the other, while both sides showed a doggedness to destroy the other. As if the wars, in particular when politics and religion are at the heart [of them], were not still particularly harmful—especially to the women and the children.

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,