> I was even more disappointed by those who passed over this murderous conflict, failing to express the slightest idea about it.[30]

Such analyses which condemn violence on both sides, and antisemitism in particular, have more weight and credibility coming from French non-Jewish and leftist radical feminists such as Christine Le Doaré, Claudie Lessellier, Catherine Deudon, and others who support these positions. It requires courage and self-assurance to overcome the mainstream thinking which holds Israel guilty by definition. It is necessary to add that in this debate, French Jewish feminists did not dare to speak openly when the atmosphere was so strained and hostile. Was this a fear of appearing "sectarian" by defending Israel? We know that the primary success of 1970s feminism was to liberate speech—of Jewish women about their own identities, as well as of feminists of all persuasions about Jewish issues, relating in particular to religion, antisemitism, Zionism, and/or Israeli policies.

On all these topics feminists have adopted any number of positions. At the beginning of the women's liberation movement, American Jewish feminists had a problem addressing the issue of antisemitism. In the 1980s, some of them blamed the movement for having failed to take seriously this evil, and they made attempts to self-analyze, confront, and reflect on it. A decade later, French feminists timidly followed in their American sisters' footsteps. But today, more than in the past, it is particularly difficult to address any Jewish topics without reducing them to media coverage of the Middle East conflict.

Jews who complain about their experience of antisemitism may find themselves denounced as presenting "antisemitism in the guise of blackmail," supposedly designed to prevent the criticism of Israel.[31] Already in Durban (August 2001), the demonization of Israel went hand in hand with hatred of Jews. Hence to avoid antisemitism, it is often recommended that Diaspora Jews systematically distance themselves from Israel—as various Jewish intellectuals in Great Britain, United States, France, and elsewhere have done by drawing up petitions and demonstrating against Israel's policies or actions. The question for those who defend Israel is whether dialogue is possible with those who deny the country's right to exist. The perennial question remains, at what point does anti-Zionism become antisemitism?

In Paris, it could not have been more clear: the demonstrations against the Israeli military operation in Gaza in July 2014 were accompanied by openly antisemitic slogans and attacks on synagogues and Jewish-owned businesses.[32] It seems that there are no taboos anymore. Regarding a gender and feminist reading of these recent events, it is clear that being a woman, even an oppressed woman, or a feminist, for that matter, is not necessarily an assurance against being an antisemite or racist.[33] Indeed, some feminist
