activists have worried that they have not succeeded in passing their positive values to younger generations. Yet it was not only young people who failed to perceive the aberration of their anti-Israel and anti-Jewish slogans. The loss of memory is the worst danger.

CONCLUSIONS

Reflections about "Jewish difference," assimilation, solidarity, and hostility can seem at first sight purely theoretical and related to the past. But current events in Jewish history and the State of Israel demand that we reexamine these issues. We observed the paradoxes of "being Jewish" in the Diaspora, with its existential and historical specificity; then the paradox of the Jew who aspires to blend in with people around him but at the same time remains attached to his particularity, visible or invisible. There is both the Jew anxious to maintain his Jewish identity and visibility, and also the one who dissociates himself from the other Jews, sometimes allying with antisemites. We are facing a fundamental Jewish dilemma of modernity—acceptance of oneself and revealing oneself as a Jew. It is linked with the solidarity, exemplarity/normality, separatism/universalism, or Jewish self-hatred, all of which can oppose, contradict, or coexist with one another. With the creation of Israel, most of these existential paradoxes and dilemmas had be resolved individually for Jews living in the Jewish state, but one of the main objectives of Zionism—the eradication of antisemitism—is far from being achieved. Indeed, it is Israel which is being targeted. Not only has it had to face enemies surrounding it who constantly announce their wish to destroy the Jewish State, but it has had to defend itself against the numerous foes who try to delegitimize it.

Through gendered readings and especially by citing feminist activists, we have tried to illustrate differing perspectives of recent events regarding the situation of Israel and of antisemitism, which is on the rise across Europe in what is arguably the worst period for Jews since the Nazis.[34]

NOTES:

1. Christina von Braun, "Sexual Images in Racist Anti-Semitism: Their Origin and Significance," lecture in English, Stockholm, 2004. The original text was published in French: "'Le Juif' et 'la femme': deux stéréotypes de 'l'autre' dans l'antisémitisme allemand du XIXe siècle," Revue germanique internationale 5 (1996): 126, 138. See also Jonathan Boyarin and Daniel Boyarin, eds., Jews and Other Differences (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1997).

2. Vladimir Jankelevich, "Ressembler dissembler," in Sources, Recueil by idem, collected by Françoise Schwab (Paris: Seuil, 1984), 96.

Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,