> taking reveals a communitarianism that falsifies the terms of the debate, in France as well as in regard to Palestine.

According to Ramadan's logic, the support of these "Jewish" intellectuals for Israel a priori disqualifies them from taking a position on the subject of antisemitism in France since it skews their perspective on this, and presumably all, matters. Ramadan's reasoning seems to be that these "Jewish" intellectuals have allowed their "Jewishness" to determine their opinions, negating their truth value and betraying the pretense to objectivity required of the universalist intellectual. I put "Jewish" in quotation marks because, since one of his primary examples (Taguieff) is not actually Jewish, Ramadan's entire line of reasoning would seem to be invalidated, if it weren't already invalidated both by his blatant hypocrisy in pretending to be any less communitarian than those he accuses.

Ramadan is certainly not alone in deploying the critique of Jewish communitarianism to discredit those who denounce the "new antisemitism." An interesting variant on this strategy can be found in the work of a young Israeli philosopher who writes in French, Alain Segré. A student of Alain Badiou (about whom more below), Segré has written two books devoted to unmasking what he labels the new "philosemitic" discourse in France—apparently any discourse that denounces antisemitism, defends Israel, or makes reference to Auschwitz. Segré's targets are the same as Ramadan's: Taguieff, Finkielkraut, Bernard-Henri Lévy, etc. But while Ramadan accuses these "Jewish" thinkers of betraying universalism because they support Israel, Segré sees them as agents of a different and far more nefarious occult power, the United States. In La Réaction philosémite ou la trahison des clercs [The Philosemitic Reaction or the Treason of the Intellectuals] of 2009, Segré denounces the "broad ideological operation aiming to impose the slogan of 'defence of the West.'"[6] Israel is merely a second-tier player in this much broader cultural and political war of reaction against the residue of 1968 and the interests of the Third World. Nothing new here. What interests me in Segré is that like Ramadan, he accuses his enemies—the French intellectuals he labels "philosemitic"—of violating universalist values. Hence the echo in Segré's title of Julien Benda's La Trahison des clercs [Treason of the Intellectuals) of 1927, which argued that French intellectuals of the Belle-Epoque betrayed universalism by encouraging particularist, racist nationalism. Segré explains that he does not mean to label the "new philosemites" partisans of a "Jewish particularism," but rather to denounce them for violating or betraying the spirit of Judaism in their cynical subservience to Western imperialism.[7] Segré follows a similar line of reasoning in his other book, Qu'appelle-t-on penser Auschwitz? [What Does One Call Thinking
