See Judith Butler, Parting Ways: Jewishness and the Critique of Zionism (New York: Columbia University Press, 2012); and Enzo Traverso, La fin de la modernité juive: Histoire d'un tournant conservateur (Paris: La Découverte, 2013). I thank Bruno Chaouat for illuminating discussions about Traverso's text.

15. Philippe Raynaud argues that Badiou's embrace of Paul must be seen in the context of debates among the ex-Maoist normaliens, and especially in relation to Benny Levy's critique of Paul in Le meurtre du pasteur: critique de la vision politique du monde (Paris: Grasset, 2002); Philippe Raynaud, *L'Extrême gauche plurielle. 17. Thus Badiou's seeming tolerance for the signs of Muslim religious identity (the veil) do not indicate a softened stance on particularism, an overcoming of the opposition between the universal and the particular binary. On the contrary, like Sartre in Antisemite and Jew, Badiou is willing to accept religious and cultural manifestations such as the veil as a necessary stage on the path to a higher universal, the overcoming of capitalism—which, as for Sartre, will presumably result in minorities gladly surrendering the outmoded vestiges of their identity.

19. And moving from the ancient to the modern, Marty points out that the current Jewish population of Israel is likewise far from the homogenous purity Badiou taxes the Jews, those new "Aryans," with trying to achieve. Rather, it contains an enormous ethnic, cultural, religious, and linguistic diversity. Israel is inherently cosmopolitan, even while defining itself as Jewish.
