In 2012, a year before the conference and the FRA's survey findings, a French citizen and self-proclaimed member of Al-Qaeda killed three French soldiers and, then, a rabbi and three Jewish children outside a Jewish day school near Toulouse. Hours after this deliberate massacre, Ashton sidestepped the centrality of murderous antisemitism by insisting that everyone remember "young people who have been killed in all sorts of terrible circumstances."[7] Among these, she mentioned child casualties in Gaza. Ashton's analogizing proved so offensive that the EU issued two versions of her statements in an effort to clarify. Additionally, her office posted a separate condemnation of the murder and then extended sympathy to the people of France and the Jewish community.[8] As if the term "antisemitism" were taboo, its role was nowhere mentioned.

Three years later, EU officials appeared similarly averse to address the antisemitic dimensions of the slaughters at Charlie Hebdo and the kosher supermarket that alarmed Paris in 2015. While the EU's culture ministers issued a unanimous condemnation of the "intolerance and ignorance" that led to the "senseless barbarity" of the Charlie Hebdo merders, they omitted mention of the Jews who were murdered for simply being Jews.[9] The President of the Commission and the Director of the FRA responded similarly. And, when the European Parliament called for a moment of silence for all the murder victims, its president stated, "These 17 cartoonists, journlists, police officers, employees and ordinary Jewish citizens were killed because they represented things that fanatics cannot stand: criticism, humour, satire, and free speech."[10] Whether he regarded the Jews as critics, comics, or exemplers of EU citizenship is beside the point. His failure to specifically mention antisemitism signals a dangerous reluctance to forcefully confront the reasons why "fanatics" single out Jews.

This chapter suggests that the denial of antisemitism's centrality to these and other crimes is longstanding. It is evidenced, not least, in the very establishment of agencies and definitions ostensibly designed to alleviate prejudice against Jews.

In the weeks leading up to the Global Forum for Combatting Antisemitism and in advance of the FRA's official release of its survey results, the Agency quietly withdrew its predecessor's "working definition of antisemitism" from the EU's website. Thereafter, incredulous commentators bemoaned the definition's disappearance. Those like Arsen Ostrovsky wondered why the agency would "now remove even the tenuous definition of the very crime it seeks to combat?"[11] Writing for the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Shimon Samuels insisted that while the Jews lost an "important weapon against Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,