attacks against Jews were tied to virulent anti-Zionism and to perpetrators who were "above all either right-wing extremists or radical Islamists or young muslims of Arab descent," the EUMC back peddled by referring to the research as methodologically unsound and to the findings as "divisive." The EUMC's claims backfired once the CRA's experts released their draft report and the EMUC's countless efforts to alter the survey's findings. In essence, the CRA exposed the EUMC for its efforts to disseminate misleading results.

Ironically, the most notable aspect of the 2003 report on antisemitism was the controversy the Centre generated in trying to shelve it. Nonetheless, its somewhat dubious revisions prior to its eventual release are also noteworthy. For instance, the Centre expunged evidence of the extreme left's role in violent attacks against Jews in Denmark and Sweden. The Centre similarly deleted a reference from the draft report about Swedish Nazis who enthusiastically embraced Islamic antisemites. In addition to those edits that virtually expunged virulent antisemitism from both the left and Islamic sources, the Centre's Director circulated a false summary of the report's findings that suggested that the largest group of perpetrators were "young, disaffected white European[s], often stimulated by extreme right wing groups."[17] While the data do not discount the involvement of far right perpetrators, they nonetheless suggest that, in some states, this segment reduced their involvement with antisemitism. In France, for example, researchers found that "the percentage of anti-Semitic violence attributable to the extreme-right was only 9 percent in 2002 (against 14 percent in 2001 and 68 percent in 1994)."[18] Thus, the CRA found the extreme right's mobilization did not play a decisive role in the wave of antisemitism that engulfed Europe months prior to the report.[19] Had the CRA's researchers been any less professional and tenacious, the EUMC may have succeeded in luring the public into thinking that antisemitism stemmed from a far right that also counted Muslims among its top victims.

Angered by the EUMC's manipulation of data and its reticence to acknowledge the changing cast of antisemitism's leading characters, the European Jewish Congress and others publicly denounced the Centre for its bait and switch research summary.

The Working Definition—Informally Adopted and Withdrawn

Exposed as inadequate to monitor and analyze a prejudice it did not understand and had never defined, the Centre then enlisted the assistance of Jewish organizations and leading scholars in formulating a "Working
