issued two brief overviews concerning antisemitism (in 2009 and 2011). Both lamented the dearth of statistical data that stemmed from a prejudice too few Member State authorities had bothered to define.[31] And while its predecessor's earlier adoption of a working definition might have resolved this conundrum, this fact was nowhere mentioned. The Agency thus revisited—without the least irony—the methodological quandaries that stemmed from reporting a problem its researchers had yet to define.

When the FRA released its 2013 survey on antisemitism, it had already withdrawn the definition from its website—much to the elation of the pro-Palestinian website Electronic Intifada that first reported on it.

In responding to those from within Europe's Jewish community who appealed to the FRA to reinstate it, an Agency spokeswoman insisted she was "not aware of any official definition." Moreover, she submitted, "The agency does not need to develop its own definition of antisemitism to research these issues."[32] Despite the outcry her answers provoked, the EU had never adopted an official (and thus legal) definition of antisemitism and its 2013 report on Jewish perceptions of antisemitism testified to some of the comparable data that could be generated without one.

For the Electronic Intifada, the Agency's removal of the definition was welcome because it had been "invoked in a number of cases in bids to muzzle Palestine solidarity activism and speech, particularly on campus."[33] Angered, for instance, that "Israeli apartheid week" efforts and the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement had been condemned as antisemitic, the Electronic Intifada placed the working definition in its crosshairs and insisted the FRA focus on fighting "real racism."[34]

In supporting a definition that registered Israel's vilification as a manifestation of antisemitism, the Agency risked the ire of fervent "anti-Zionists" and those Arab countries with which the EU had long endeavored to curry favor. Europe's efforts to court these states began, in 1973, after Egypt and Syria (with the assistance of other Arab states) attacked Israel. When Israel emerged victorious, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) announced a retaliatory reduction in oil production and an embargo on oil exports to the United States and those European countries they viewed as supportive of Israel. While the United States refused to relent, the European Community (EC) of then nine Members adopted the Brussels Declaration.[35] It called on Israel to withdraw to its 1949 armistice lines and recognized that "a just and lasting peace" requires the recognition of "the legitimate rights of the Palestinians" who, until that moment, were known instead as Arabs. A satisfied OPEC then lifted its sanctions against all EC members, save the Netherlands (which had allowed U.S. aircraft carrying Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,