history magazine Focus Historia Ekstra published to coincide with the 70th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising:

> This nonsense about Jews being killed mostly by Poles was created to hide the biggest Jewish secret: The scale of the German crime was only possible because the Jews themselves participated in the murder of their own people. . . . The Jews have a problem because they are convinced they are the chosen people. They feel they are entitled to interpret everything, including Catholic doctrine. . . . I am convinced that there is no point in dialogue with the Jews, because it doesn't lead anywhere. I am completely convinced that the crime at Jedwabne and other pogroms were not committed to seize Jewish property or as revenge for the many terrible things that Jews did to the Poles in the past. The pogroms were mostly motivated by great fear of the Jews. These desperate murderers may have told themselves that they were doing terrible things, but that their grandchildren would be grateful to them. I think that such an interpretation is possible though it does not absolve them of the crime.[19]

However, the case of Jasiewicz—who came under heavy attack in the scholarly community for his outburst and eventually lost his post at the Academy—is especially interesting because it also says much about the changed ambience in Poland.

Charges of Jewish conspiracy and that Jews seek to gain political, economic and cultural hegemony over the country have traditionally enjoyed a certain currency on the Polish street. That such views should persist in the place that had been the epicenter of the Shoah, and at a time when even the most generous estimates put the Jewish population, however high its visibility, at no more than several thousand, seems especially perverse. Beyond the halls of academia, radio and television studios and more "polite society," the reaction of gutter-level antisemites to these findings has been to lash out angrily against those historians who dared unearth these stains on Poland's escutcheon.[20]

Privatization and the restitution of property seized by the Communist regime has been another particularly charged issue and a constant lightning rod for antisemites. In 2011, the popular weekly digest Angora, with a circulation of over 400,000, featured a story on the restitution of Jewish property in Poland entitled "What more do we have to give back to the Jews?" The cover of the magazine was adorned with a full page photo of a Hasidic father and son. The father, pointing to the iconic Palace of Culture and Science on the Warsaw skyline, says "Son, one day all this will be yours."[21]
