of Zion. None of this augers well for the future, and suggests that earlier assessments may have been too sanguine. . . .

2. These unguarded words, uttered by Polish-born Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir in 1989, in an interview with David Landau of the Jerusalem Post (who he had believed was no longer taping him) continue to be widely cited in Poland as an example of Jewish "anti-Polonism."

3. Perhaps the most telling expression of the ambience in Poland at that time can be found in the now-famous conversation between Poland's ambassador to Germany, Józef Lipski, and Adolf Hitler. After that meeting in September 1938 at which German schemes for the mass emigration of Jews from Central and Eastern Europe was discussed, Lipski minuted back to Warsaw that he told the Führer that if these plans were fulfiled, Poles "would erect a beautiful monument for him in Warsaw."

4. Figures vary on the number of Jews who fell victim to these acts. Whatever their motivation, and irrespective of the number of victims, the result was a mass exodus of Jewish survivors with especially bitter memories of Poland.

Galili quotes an unamed Polish diplomat who maintains that "the situation has changed. . . . [I]t''s mostly due to the constant contact people in Poland, and certainly its politicians, have with EU politicians and residents not favorably inclined toward Israel."According to Galili, the same diplomat went on to note that he assumes that that the shift in popular sympathy toward the Palestinian cause will also affect the stance of Polish politicians.

10. In a lecture at Yad Vashem on 4 Dec. 2014 to mark his acceptance of the Yad Vashem International Book Prize for Holocaust Research, Jan Grabowski explained that the traditional paradigim of the "perpetrators, victims, and bystanders" advanced by Raoul Hilberg must be reevaluated in light of what we now know about the behavior of Polish (and in fact much of European) society toward the Jews during the German occupation. Clearly a new category had to be elaborated. It should also be noted that in the years leading up to the war, the Catholic Church in Poland propagated an especially negative view of Jews. This was exemplified by the February 29, 1936 pastoral letter of Cardinal August Hlond who wrote: "It is an actual
