Such a view resulted from the significant evolution of Dugin's ideas concerning world Jewry. In his 1994 book, The Conservative Revolution, Dugin wrote that the "world of 'Judaica' is hostile to us."[7] He defined the "Jewish Diaspora of Russia and Eastern Europe" as an enemy of Russian nationalism, blamed Jews for crucifying Jesus, which symbolically continued with their rejection of the sacred nature of the Byzantine State and Moscow (as the "Third Rome").[8] Yet he did not propose to solve the "Jewish problem" through power. In his 1997 article "Jews and Eurasia" Dugin adopted the idea put forth by Yakov Bromberg, a Eurasianist of the 1920s and 1930s, who divided world Jewry into the positive "Jewry of the East" (religiously, Hasidic-Kabbalistic; and secularly, Bolshevik) and the negative "Jewry of the West" (religiously, Talmudic-Rationalistic and Maimonidic; and secularly, enlightened, humanistic, bourgeois-capitalistic, liberal-democratic).[9] Using this inter-Jewish dichotomy, Dugin explains both the significant role of Jews in the Bolshevik movement, and also in the collapse of the Soviet Union, by the metamorphosis of the "Jewry of the East" into the "Jewry of the West." According to Dugin, "positive" Jewry will contribute to the general struggle against Western culture, and to the founding of the "Great Eurasian Empire" through its conflict with "negative" Jewry.[10] Only under this condition of the inter-Jewish civil war was he able to reconcile and express respect for Orthodox Jewry and extreme right-wing Zionism.

Paradoxically, Dugin continued to claim that Israel was established as "national-socialist racist state" and a component of an American empire that is more dangerous to Russia than the growing risk of Russia's "political Islamization."[11]

The second person we shall consider is Geydar Dzhemal, born in 1947 in Moscow to an Azeri father and Russian mother. His parents divorced and he was raised by his Russian grandfather—the director of the Maly Theater and First Deputy Minister of Culture of the Soviet Union. Dzhemal entered the highly prestigious Institute of Oriental Languages at Moscow State University in 1965, but a year later, he was expelled "for bourgeois nationalism." In the 1970s, he also joined in the "Black Order of SS." In 1979, he became active in the underground All-Soviet Islamic Movement and made contact with Islamic activists in Tadzhikistan. In the late 1980s, he joined in the National-Patriotic Front Pamiat. Dzhemal was a deputy chairman in founding the Islamic Renaissance Party in 1990. He participated in 1993 in the Islamic People's Conference in Khartoum, Sudan where the Is-
