in the Israeli army. The article alleged that Turkish Jews holding dual citizenship had rushed to "massacre" Palestinians after Israel announced the operation. The paper also suggested that Jewish Turks involved in fighting against innocent Palestinians had returned to Turkey to "resume their lives as if nothing happened." Milat's report was based on a social media campaign launched by several journalists and activists: #israilaskeriistemiyoruz (we do not want Israeli soldiers). A website with the same name urged citizens to sign a petition demanding Parliament revoke the Turkish citizenship of anyone fighting in the Israeli army on the grounds that they had committed premeditated murder. The petition also urged the Ministry of Defense to abolish the legal exemption regarding military service for people who held dual citizenship and who had served in the Israeli army. According to a 1993 law, citizens with more than one nationality are exempt from military service in Turkey if they have served in the military of a country that Turkey recognizes.[30]

Another example of targeting the Turkish Jewish community is found in the comment of Bülent Yıldırım of the IHH, made in a television interview on TVNET on July 17. According to him, there was one vulnerable point over which Israel could be made to stop its absurdly dangerous behavior, namely, the Jewish community. Most of Israel's money, he claimed, comes from the Turkish Jews.

> A tax has continuously been paid to the Mossad from here [Turkey]. Soldiers are constantly going to Israel from here. The Turkish community must act and stop Israel's self-indulgence immediately. Otherwise, the people living here will experience unwanted consequences. . .they [the Israelis] tell people under forty [in Jerusalem] that they cannot enter the AlAqsa Mosque. Shall we also gather the people in front of synagogues? Shall we also tell Jews of this age that they cannot enter? What do they want by doing this?. . . Jewish tourists, what are you looking for in Turkey? The Zionists are putting the future of the Jews in danger. We cannot hold back our youngsters any longer.[31]

Not surprisingly, such intimidation led many Turkish Jews to consider making Aliyah. An Istanbul Jewish resident who asked to remain anonymous said, "it gets worse from day to day—in the press, in the streets, and in general. I do not reveal the fact that I am a Jew and I would deny it if asked. It is a spine chilling thing."[32] When Israeli journalists wished to interview one synagogue's leaders, they were told, "we are not allowed to discuss this topic. It is dangerous, very dangerous." A member of the community who had spoken previously with the same journalists explained, "the situation is
