too delicate right now I don't want to take the risk."[33] Jewish community representatives noted that the community is "in a panic":

> There is no war in our country but we are stressed as if we are at war. We are fearful. There is a wave of xenophobia and above that anti-Semitism is rife. It is very stifling for those who live under this continuous problem.[34]

The Jewish writer and lawyer Rita Ender reported that

> Turks come in front of our synagogues, shouting in a threatening way. They hang around the neighborhood where we live, staring straight into the eyes of the Jewish children in a threatening way, wearing T-shirts printed with a picture of Hitler and swastikas.[35]

Utku Çakırözer from Cumhuriyet quoted community representatives, saying, "wherever the community members go these days we are told that we will pay the price for Israel murdering Gazan children."[36] The source added that the stressful situation is exploited to collect protection money: "Very odd things happen. They have threatened a very good famous friend of ours who owns a clothing brand: 'if you don't give us this money, we will protest in front of your shop.'"[37] As happened in the past, some shops posted signs on their front windows announcing that "Jew dogs" are banned from entering. A mobile phone accessory shop located in Tahtakalede Hasırcılar İş Merkezi in Istanbul, an area where many Jewish businesses are situated, posted just such a sign in its front window in August 2014.

In a bazaar in Konya, many shops put up signs saying ""Jewish goods are not sold here," in a protest against Israel's attacks in Gaza, especially "the murder of the innocent Palestinian children playing on the beach." The blurred line between "Israeli goods" and "Jewish goods" was significant.[38]

On August 22, 2014, Georgia and Jak Karako, a prominent and affluent Jewish couple, were found stabbed to death in their apartment in Istanbul's upscale Ortaköy neighborhood. The couple had been murdered by an Uzbek couple who worked as caretakers for the family. The Uzbek couple allegedly confessed during interrogation, stating that they killed the Karako couple for refusing to pay them for two months' work. But an unnamed source in Turkey told the Algemeiner website that there is so much mistrust between members of the Jewish community and the Turkish government that the truth about the murder may never be revealed. "It will be some manipulated version of what happened," said the source.[39] Whether this murder was committed because of antisemitism or greed, Burak Bekdil of the Hürriyet Daily News claimed that the anti-Jewish atmosphere in Turkey had
