one sovereign government." As Arab nationalists grew bitter, pan-Arab nationalism emerged throughout the Arab world.[2]

An important turning-point came when the House of Saud united the kingdome of the Hejaz and Nejd, and created the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia in 1932. Around the same time, radical Islam arose. The Muslim Brotherhood [al-Ikhwān al-Muslimūn], established in 1928, quickly became the main radical movement.[3]

Radical Islam soon took on a different color. Although it is sometimes described as a by-product of fundamentalism, it is really fundamentalism influenced by Western totalitarian dogmas: Marxism, Leninism, fascism, and National Socialism. The borders between radical Islam, Islamic fundamentalism, and Arab nationalism have always been porous. Fundamentalist Islam seeks after all power in this world. It claims to be the true religion—the religion of God—and its truth is manifest in its power. "[I]f Muslims now return to the original Islam, they can preserve and even restore their power."[4]

In the late 1950s, the political landscape of the Muslim world was relatively easy to describe. Saudi Arabia was fundamentalist. Some moderate kingdoms existed: Jordan, Morocco, and Iran. Turkey was a seculrar republic. Lebanon was a "unitary confessionalist" republic, resting on a power-sharing mechanism based on religious communities.[5] At that time, Arab nationalists had already seized power in Egypt, Syria, Iraq, Tunisia, and were about to take power in Algeria. The major Muslim countries in Asia—Pakistan and Indonesia—were not especially present in the news. Pakistan declared Islam as its state religion in 1949: most Pakistani Muslims belonged at the time to the Barelvi movement, much influenced by Sufism.[6] The Deobandi movement, inspired by Wahhabism, was not politically influential. And in Indonesia, the main Muslim groups—Nahdlatul Ulama and Muhammadiyah—advocated religious moderation.[7]

Radical Islam was growing, but was still confined to the shadows during the early 1960s, while Arab nationalism was steadily gaining ground. Libya and Algeria were added to the list of countries ruled by people calling themselves nationalists in this period. In the 1970s, a civil war erupted in Lebanon. Palestinian militias were expelled from Jordan. They settled in South Lebanon and began fighting the Christian militias. As central government authority disintegrated, Shi'a militias that were beginning to form also joined the fighting.[8]

The great change occurred, however, on April 1, 1979: Iran, with its version of radical Shi'a Islam, became an Islamic Republic.[9] From then on, radical Islam spread rapidly. In 1985, various violent Lebanese Shi'a Copyright © 2016. Nebraska. All rights reserved.

Anti-Judaism, Antisemitism, and Delegitimizing Israel, Nebraska, 2016. ProQuest Ebook Central,