President Clinton, although a friend of Israel, witnessed more Israelis killed by terrorists on his watch than all U.S. presidents from Harry Truman to George H.W. Bush combined.

President Ronald Reagan, also a friend of Israel, had as his main concern the danger posed by the Soviet Union. Even though he treated Israel as a reliable ally and fought to free Jews from the Soviet Union, in 1981 he decided to temporarily suspend the delivery of F-16 jet fighters to Israel following an Israeli raid on a nuclear reactor in Osirak, Iraq, purchased from France by Saddam Hussein. In 1982, Reagan announced a two-stage plan: for Israel to pull out its troops in Lebanon, and to also withdraw from the West Bank and Gaza. Israel eventually completed a full withdrawal from South Lebanon in 2000, but the second stage of the plan was killed by resistance from the Israeli government. Under the presidency of George W. Bush ("Bush 43"), also a friend of Israel, the "peace process" that was to have emerged from the Oslo Accords ground to a total halt.

After the attack on the World Trade Center and Pentagon on September 11, 2001, Bush understood that radical Islam was a global threat to world peace. He tried to reshape the Middle East to prepare it for democracy and to break the backbone of radical Islam, but he was not successful. Under his presidency, a majority of European leaders acted according to the unwritten rules of Eurabia. They placed themselves on the side of the most extreme form of Arab nationalism, the brutal dictatorship of Saddam Hussein, and did all they could to appease radical Islam. When they could see that radical Islam and Israel were not compatible, they preferred radical Islam and opposition to the aims of George W. Bush.

President Barack Obama, from the beginning of his term, adopted policies toward Israel and Islam that most Europeans agreed with. From his leftist standpoint, he seems to regard radical Islam's vision of the world as an expression of Muslim rage coming from the abuses committed by "American imperialism."[16] Obama appears to think that if only the alleged abuses were corrected, and radical Islam gained power, the world would become a more friendly place. He very much approved of the Muslim Brotherhood in both Turkey and Egypt. Indeed, he held up as a "role model" of Muslim leadership Turkey's Islamist Prime Minister, Recep Tayyip Erdoğan, who once said, "Democracy is like a streetcar. You ride it until you arrive at your destination and then you step off." According to Erdoğan, "mosques are our barracks, the domes our helmets, the minarets our bayonets, the faithful our soldiers."

In 2010, Obama issued "Presidential Study Directive 11," ordering an assessment of the Muslim Brotherhood and other "political Islamist" organizations. He concluded the the United States should shift from its policy
