of supporting stability in the Middle East to a policy of backing Islamic political movements. He encouraged the overthrow of Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak in 2011 and, despite massive protests, supported President Mohamed Morsi and his government until the last moment, when President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi took over. Obama is also sympathetic to the grievances of the Shi'a Islamist regime in Tehran, which considers Israel an ally of "American imperialism."

On June 4, 2009, in a speech in Cairo addressed to the Muslim world, Obama drew a connection between "daily humiliations that come with occupation" to the "humiliation of segregation" of Blacks in America. He has said several times that he supports a "solution" based on the Arab Peace Initiative promulgated at the 2002 Beirut Summit of the Arab League, and has called many times for Israel's return to the indefensible pre-1967 borders.

Remarkably, Zionism has continued to succeed despite the supine pro-Arab and Muslim policy of Europe; despite fluctuations in the alliance between Israel and the United States, as well as the pressure to make costly concessions. Not even Obama has been able to bring Israel to its knees.

In 1948–1949, 1967, and again in 1973, the Arab states used conventional armies to try to destroy Israel. They attacked, mostly in the name of Arab nationalism and partly in the name of Islamic fundamentalism. In 1948–1949, they had the implicit support of Western powers. In 1967 and in 1973, the United States sided with Israel, whereas European powers were hostile or cool, but refrained from announcing outright support for the eventual destruction of Israel. Before 1973, the "Palestinian cause" did not really exist or was at best embryonic.

The Fatah movement, founded in 1959, remained marginal and unimportant until the creation of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1964 by a decision of Arab nationalist leaders in Egypt and Syria, in coordination with the Soviet Union. Its aim was to create a "national liberation struggle" and a "people" fighting for its liberation. It was only then that the "Palestinian people" and the "Palestinian cause" became a reality, although it took some time for this to take center stage. The PLO, structured according to the pattern of Arab nationalism, used its vocabulary with touches of classic Soviet propaganda. Israel began to be described as a by-product of "colonialism," and as a bridgehead of "American imperialism" in the region. A Middle Eastern, romanticized Che Guevara-type of terrorist was created—the leader of the Fatah movement, Yasser Arafat. The aim was to seduce as many people as possible in the West, especially among the younger generation.
