Terror assaults went hand in hand with diplomatic attacks and disinformation. Arab diplomats worked closely with "Palestinian" organizations. European diplomats who wished to establish economic and strategic links with the Arab world worked with Arab diplomats, and warmly received leaders of Palestinian organizations. They adopted the Arab version of the Middle East conflict and the "Palestinian" vision of Israel. Most American diplomats followed suit. Indeed, while some U.S. administrations have been supportive of Israel, all of them have said they support the rights of the "Palestinian people."

Since the 1970s, the Soviet propaganda apparatus produced all the necessary elements of disinformation.[19] "Pro-Palestinain" movements were created, existing "pacifist" movements were mobilized, and protests were organized. Journalists were recruited to disseminate descriptions of "facts" that other journalists used as if they were indisputable. Pseudo-historians rewrote the history of the Middle East. The falisfied version of history replaced history itself. After a few years, Western media, too, were using similar descriptions of "facts" that had been disseminated by such propaganda without any critical reflection.

The Soviet propaganda apparatus disappeared when the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991, but what had been sown remains, and continues its momentum. For example, today Israel is still described almost everywhere in the West as an "aggressor," an "occupier," a "colonizer," or as a country that treats its minorities badly. This is essentially Soviet terminology. Few bother to compare how Israel treats Palestinians to how their own "brothers" in Arab and Muslim countries treat them. The "Palestinian people," who officially emerged on the scene only in 1964, are presented as a people as old as the Jewish people, as if a country called "Palestine" had ever existed in the past and as if "Palestine" had been illegitimately and arbitrarily displaced by Israel seven decades ago. The Gaza Strip, Judea, and Samaria are defined as "occupied Palestinian territories," even though much of Judea and Samaria today are ruled by the Palestinian Authority and Fatah, and every Jew was forcibly removed from the Gaza Strip by the Israelis themselves in 2005. The very existence of a Jewish people is questioned by bestselling authors, and the ties of the Jewish people to their historic homeland are constantly challenged.[20]

"Palestinian" atrocities are almost never described as terrorism. Violence against Israel is almost never condemned. Israel's responses in self-defense are almost always defined as "disproportionate," "barbaric," and "criminal." "Zionism" itself has become a dirty word. Being an "anti-Zionist" and fighting to erase Israel from the map has become a widely-accepted attitude.
