have produced growing tensions. Islam's increasing influence in Europe is not exactly improving the continent. Europe continues to deteriorate.

If hatred of Israel is also increasing in the United States, it is largely confined to academia and radical circles, many of which receive funding from organizations trying to increase this hostility. Israel still has many friends among Americans. Ties to Arab and Muslim countries exist but have much less of an influence on America's economy, politics, and culture than they have in Europe. If Jews leave the United States, it is because they choose to, not because they feel unsafe or unwanted.

Many American companies work together with Israeli enterprises and have branches in Israel. Many Israeli start-ups are bought or financed by American companies. Virtually all American leaders know that Israeli technology is very beneficial to the U.S. economy. Even in the Obama administration, there are limits to what the president can do: Congress will never pass any law that could threaten the ecnomic and strategic ties between the United States and Israel. A new president will be elected in November 2016 and a new administration will be formed. Almost certainly it will not choose to harm U.S.-Israel relations.

Other leaders of major countries in the world, including Russia, China, Brazil, India, and Japan also see the economic, technological and military importance of Israel, and respect what it has accomplished. Nevertheless, millions of people still dream of destroying Israel and killing the Jews. What Jews brought to the world—one of the earliest codes of humanitarian law, social justice, and respect for education—is rarely acknowledged. Yet Israel is respected by most leaders of the world and feared by its enemies. Even leaders who despise Israel do respect it. As long as such views hold, and Jews who are persecuted elsewhere can find refuge and build full lives in Israel, those who created the Jewish State will have achieved their goal.
